

MORALITY IN FINLAND.

A Land Where a Good Name Is More Than Riches.

The Punishment for Crime Does Not Wipe Out the Stain, and Wealth Cannot Compensate for Loss of Reputation.

The standard of morality in Finland—not that morality which consists merely in the keeping up of appearances and the throwing of dust in our neighbors' eyes—is much higher than in most countries, decidedly higher than in Sweden, which has grafted so many of its civilizing institutions on the Finnish stock. Finland is united to the Russian empire, and its capital, Helsinki, is but a night's journey from St. Petersburg, and yet the difference between the two countries in religion, morality and well-being could not be greater were they separated from each other by the earth's diameter.

This enormous difference is manifest in outward things; in nothing so strikingly as the aspect of the streets of Finnish cities at night. A woman, or a girl, would be afraid to walk alone at night, even on the Nevsky Prospect, in St. Petersburg, and this feeling is amply justified by the insults to which those respectable females are occasionally subjected whom the necessity drives out after eight or nine o'clock at night. In Helsinki, on the contrary, a girl may walk alone in any quarter of the city at any hour of the night without the slightest risk or apprehension. And this outward appearance of decorum and propriety, which surpasses anything I have noticed in any other European city, is not a mere ornamental mantle, a coating of whitewash given to a moral scupcher, a beautiful outside, but within full of dead men's bones and of all uncleanliness, says a writer in the London Telegraph.

It is a very fair indication of the moral condition of the Grand Duchy. In Finland public opinion is an irresistible force—incomparably stronger than mere legal restraints and barriers—and it is wholly enlisted on the side of morality and justice. The population is one immense family of two millions and a half, all the members of which, when once they have attained a certain standard of public usefulness, are more or less known to each other, and each one feels that in all the turning points of life the eyes of all his countrymen are fixed upon him, and a disgraceful action is remembered for generations.

A good name and fame, therefore, is a concrete reality in Finland, where, without it, a man is disqualified from occupying a post of trust in the office of any large firm and serving the state in any capacity. The only refuge open to him—if there chance to be a vacancy—is the post of censor of Finnish books and newspapers for the Russian government, an occupation which erects an impassable barrier between him and his countrymen for all time.

In Finland a bankrupt, whatever the cause of his failure, is under a cloud which, even in favorable cases, it requires some time and great efforts to dispel; and, if a dishonest bankrupt, he is under lock and key as well. And although when he has undergone his sentence in prison and afterward remained in moral quarantine for a year, or two or three, during which he must keep aloof from all trade and commerce, he is permitted to begin anew, a sadder and a wiser man; he is usually wise enough to refuse to avail himself of the privilege, well knowing that no amount of capital can compensate for the loss of one's good name, without which trade or commerce in Finland is an utter impossibility.

The visible results of this healthy moral tone of the community are that vice and crime are rapidly diminishing, and show a strong tendency to disappear. And this is perfectly natural. The collapse of most men in all countries in the struggle for life can be shown to be in consequence of moral rather than intellectual defects, and it is to this collapse that the greatest number of vices and crimes are attributable.

Now, the Finns are intellectually less nimble and plastic than the French, less imaginative and subtle than the Russians and less sentimental than the Germans, but they make up for a certain mental sluggishness and stiffness by an extremely delicate moral sensibility, to which they are indebted for most of their political and economical successes.

Dwellings of Belgian Workmen.

The results of the official inquiry into the condition of the dwellings of the working classes in Belgium have just been published. According to the return there were in Brussels on December 31, 1890, 49,410 families, of which 10,284 were the families of workmen. The number of houses in the city was 10,594, inhabited by 168,168 persons. There are 4,601 houses inhabited by the working classes, 105 common lodging houses, and 3,436 places of business. The rent of a room for a workman averages $1.68 a month. The average daily wages of a workman is $1.14. Of the 10,284 working-class families in Brussels 20,492 have occasional recourse to public charity. Of working-class families 491 occupy an entire house, 1,371 occupy three rooms, 8,058 have but two rooms, and 4,978 have to be content with only one; 2,183 families lodge in garrets, 1,200 in cellars. In 1,511 cases a family of five persons live in a single room. In 400 families the boys and girls sleep in the same bed.

Effects of a Heavy Lunch.

An Atholman man had a "nightmare" after eating a lunch of cheese, mustard and dried beef, and had a disagreeable dream that his son was in great danger; instead of being unable to run from ghosts, as is usually the case in nightmares, he was unable to get ready to go to the rescue of his son. Finally he awoke, and was so impressed with the dream that he went into his son's room. He found him out of bed and on the roof of the house, where he had climbed in his sleep.
